

United Nations Chief Calls for 'New Approach' to Prevent War and Promote Peace

United Nations, January 12 (RHC)-- New Secretary General of the United Nations Antonio Guterres has urged a "whole new approach" to prevent war and promote peace instead of focusing on responding to conflicts.

"People are paying too high a price. We need a whole new approach," Guterres said in his first address to the Security Council since taking office on January 1st. Guterres, who succeeded Ban Ki-moon, has vowed to shake up the world body and boost efforts to tackle international crises, including the conflict in Syria and the bloodshed in South Sudan.

In his speech, he expressed regret that too much time and resources have been spent on responding to crises rather than preventing them. The former Portuguese prime minister called for "a surge in diplomacy for peace" and urged the world body to make greater use of the measures in the UN Charter to find peaceful solutions to the ongoing disputes.

He said it had proved very difficult to persuade national and international decision-makers to prioritize prevention, perhaps because "the television cameras are not there when a crisis is avoided."

The new UN chief is faced with a deeply divided Security Council that has failed to take decisive action to put an end to the nearly six-year foreign-backed militancy in Syria. "Too many prevention opportunities have been lost because member states mistrusted each other's motives, and because of concerns over national sovereignty," Guterres said.

"Today, we need to demonstrate leadership, and strengthen the credibility and authority of the United Nations, by putting peace first," he added. Speaking in an interview with Portugal's SIC television channel on December 28 before taking office, Guterres said the crisis in Syria "has become a cancer on a global scale."

He also noted that the conflict had caused "not only the suffering of the Syrian people" but also ignited "violent reactions which in some cases lead to terrorist acts." Since March 2011, Syria has been gripped by deadly militancy it blames on some Western states and their regional allies.
