

UN secretary-general expresses support for Venezuela talks in Norway

United Nations, May 18 (RHC)-- Talks in Norway come as Venezuelan President Nicolas Maduro hosted members of the International Contact Group (ICG) at Miraflores Palace.

On Friday, UN Secretary-General Antonio Guterres showed support for a peaceful solution for Venezuela, expressing that he is "very much supportive" of the talks between the Latin American nation's government and opposition representatives, which took place in Norway.

The government of Norway, through a press release, confirmed Friday that preliminary contact had been made with political representatives from the Bolivarian Republic of Venezuela. The Scandinavian country explained that the meeting was "an exploratory phase" aimed at contributing to finding a solution to the situation in the country."

U.N. spokesman Stephane Dujarric, who erred on the side of caution, added that he did not "want to predict what can happen in what we know is a complicated situation, but what is clear is that the secretary-general's good offices, the United Nations' good offices, remain very much available" if called upon to participate in or accommodate further talks.

According to Al Jazeera, Norway's NRK radio and television network, quoting anonymous sources, reported that the talks between Venezuelan opposition and government officials had taken place at a secret location in the Norwegian capital for "several days."

However, the government's statement did not offer any information regarding the duration of the meeting but detailed that Oslo "commends the parties for their efforts. We reiterate our willingness to continue supporting the search for a peaceful solution for the country."
