Washington, July 30 (RHC)-- In the United States, the Justice Department has approved the merger of T-Mobile and Sprint, in a move that critics say would increase cellphone bills for consumers by decreasing competition.

The Justice Department said they only approved the deal after T-Mobile and Sprint agreed to sell some of their assets to satellite TV provider Dish Network to create a new wireless network.

Thirteen attorneys general and the District of Columbia are suing to block the $26 billion merger. Senator and 2020 candidate Elizabeth Warren tweeted: "This merger will cost thousands of jobs, reduce wages, and further reduce competition in a sector that badly needs it. We need antitrust regulators with the courage to stand up to mono
