

Venezuelan government reveals new evidence against Juan Guaido

Caracas, November 6 (RHC)-- Venezuelan Minister for Communications, Jorge Rodríguez, has presented new evidence implicating opposition leader Juan Guaido in Colombian paramilitarism and actions to destabilize the country.

During a news conference in Caracas, Rodríguez showed videos and photos proving the relationship of the opposition deputy with the armed group Los Rastrojos, former Colombian President Alvaro Uribe, and the current President of that country, Ivan Duque, which came to light during interrogations of one of the group's recently captured members.

The audiovisual materials show the testimony of Argenis Vaca, aka "Vaquita," who details each of the actions undertaken to help Guaido to enter Colombia last February, despite having to be subject to a restriction on movement outside the national territory.

Vaquita said that Los Rastrojos promoted guarimbas (violent street barricades) in several areas of Venezuela to distract the attention of national authorities from areas through which Guaido traveled, in order to attend a supposed 'humanitarian' concert to get aid into the country.

He also pointed out that the paramilitaries declared an illegal curfew in the areas where Guaidó would travel, so that no one would see him arrive at that event, after which violent actions were unleashed on the Colombian-Venezuelan border in Tachira State in order to create a false positive and justify a foreign military intervention.

During his presentation, Rodríguez stressed that no leader in Venezuela's history has been more submissive and treacherous than Guaidó.

<https://www.radiohc.cu/en/noticias/internacionales/206868-venezuelan-government-reveals-new-evidence-against-juan-guaido>

Radio Habana Cuba