

Parma staff member becomes first virus case since Serie A restart

A member of the first team staff at Parma has tested positive for COVID-19, the Serie A club said, adding that all squad staff and players have returned negative results.

It was the first case of the new coronavirus at any of the 20 football clubs since Serie A restarted on June 19.

"The person is completely asymptomatic and was promptly isolated according to federal and ministerial directives," the club said in a statement, without giving the person's identity or area of work.
