

Cuba advocates at UNESCO for acceptable practices to protect heritage

Cuban diplomat Lluraldi Cabas addresses the eighth session of UNESCO's General Assembly.

Paris, September 9 (RHC)-- Cuba advocated sharing good practices at the regional and international levels to strengthen the protection of intangible cultural heritage.

Prensa Latina news agency reported on Wednesday that Cuban diplomat Lluraldi Cabas highlighted the importance of cooperation as a tool to improve the processes of identification, awareness, and safeguarding of 'living heritage,' during his address in the eighth session of the General Assembly of the 178 Member States of the convention adopted in 2003 to preserve this treasure of humanity.

According to the first secretary of the Permanent Mission of Cuba, it is also essential to strengthen the capabilities to protect the practices, expressions, knowledge, or techniques transmitted by the communities from generation to generation, particularly in urban contexts.

Cabas urged promoting, in the same way, the collaboration between the Small Island Developing States, in the face of the consequences of climate change and natural disasters on their intangible cultural heritage.

On Tuesday, the permanent representative of Cuba to UNESCO, Yahima Esquivel, reiterated Cuba's support for the multilateral safeguarding instrument at the General Assembly of the Convention.

Esquivel stressed Cuba's commitment to work on implementing the mechanism, whose Intergovernmental Committee the country will integrate until the end of the Assembly.
