

Chicago hunger strikers call out environmental racism, try to stop relocation of scrapyards

Chicago hunger strikers call out environmental racism, try to stop relocation of scrapyards.
(Photo: Twitter: dudgedudy)

Chicago, March 4 (RHC)-- In the U.S. city of Chicago, over 100 activists are on hunger strike to protest the relocation of the General Iron metal shredding plant to the Southeast Side of Chicago — in an area with mostly Black and Brown residents and which already suffers from poor air quality due to industrial pollution.

The scrapyards are being moved from their current location to make way for the controversial, multibillion-dollar Lincoln Yards development in the city of Chicago, Illinois.

Oscar Sanchez, one of the hunger strikers, said: “Our community is considered a sacrifice zone by the city, which continues policies of environmental racism. This is only the latest case of industry being pushed to Black and Brown communities in Chicago. We’re calling on Mayor Lori Lightfoot to break the racist legacy of exploiting Black and Brown communities as dumping grounds for industry, and allowing neighborhoods to breathe, to flourish.”

A rally is planned in front of Mayor Lori Lightfoot’s home to mark one month since the start of the hunger strike.

<https://www.radiohc.cu/en/noticias/internacionales/249610-chicago-hunger-strikers-call-out-environmental-racism-try-to-stop-relocation-of-scrapyard>

Radio Habana Cuba