

Cuban president ratifies that science is contributing to save the nation

Havana, October 22 (RHC)-- Cuba's epidemiological situation is changing for the better every day, thanks to the commitment and performance of the Cuban health system and the contribution of science and innovation, said Cuban President Miguel Díaz-Canel Bermúdez.

Addressing participants this week at a recent meeting of the Council of Ministers, Díaz-Canel said the results of the immunization campaign and the effectiveness of the vaccines are evident.

In these last weeks, he recalled, we have maintained a stable decrease in the number of daily cases, deaths, admitted patients, and active cases, in figures that were far away in time.

With their proven high efficacy, vaccines have become a source of national pride, Díaz-Canel reflected before the highest body of the Cuban Government. They have helped us reach new normality that now allows us to reactivate our economic activity, both state and private.
