

Haitian police kill journalist amid protests by exploited garment workers

Image not found or type unknown

In Haiti, one journalist was killed and others injured after police opened fire on a demonstration of factory workers in Port-au-Prince demanding living wages.

Port-au-Prince, February 24 (RHC)-- In Haiti, one journalist was killed and others injured after police opened fire on a demonstration of factory workers in Port-au-Prince demanding living wages.

Earlier this week, Haiti's government announced a minimum wage increase of up to 54% following weeks of demonstrations and amid soaring inflation. But striking garment workers say that even with the pay raise, their salary is still just half, or less, of the roughly $15 per day they are demanding.

Similien Miguelson, one of the organizers of the protest, told reporters: "Once again, we've taken to the streets to protest the wage adjustment of $1.70, because we do not accept it. In the letters we've sent to Prime Minister Ariel Henry, we have demanded $14 and social benefits. We've been to four meetings without reaching a solution."

Garment workers in Haiti make clothes in sweatshop conditions for major U.S. brands, including Gap, Walmart and Target, and for Canada's Gildan Activewear.

<https://www.radiohc.cu/en/noticias/internacionales/287355-haitian-police-kill-journalist-amid-protests-by-exploited-garment-workers>

Radio Habana Cuba