

Solidarity after earthquakes brings Cuba and Türkiye closer

Image not found or type unknown

Havana, March 12 (RHC) Cuba's solidarity with Türkiye after the earthquakes that struck that Eurasian country has brought both peoples closer, members of the Henry Reeve Medical Brigade who collaborated in that country assured here on Saturday.

Upon arriving at the Jose Marti International Airport in Havana, the head of that solidarity group, Juan Carlos Dupuy, highlighted the welcome they received in Ankara, and then in the southern province of Karaman Barach, the epicenter of the strong earthquakes that killed more than 46,000 people in Türkiye.

In statements to Prensa Latina, Dupuy described as timely, professional, and beautiful the work done by all 32 collaborators from Cuba, including 19 doctors, nine nurses and paramedical specialists, and other experts, including four women.

He noted that from the day of their arrival in the disaster area, the group was involved in treating three serious cases while deploying its specialists, and maintained intense and uninterrupted work for the 24 days that they stayed in that country.

Dupuy underscored the high professional level of Turkish doctors, with whom the Cuban team was quickly integrated into urgent care and emergencies, as well as community interventions at the primary level. In turn, Orlando Brache, a graduate in intensive care nursing, described his experiences amid the tragedy as unforgettable, since it allowed them to verify that language and cultural barriers, including low temperatures, did not represent obstacles for the humanitarian work that he took to that distant region.

Turks and Cubans were a single working team caring for those affected and saving lives, said Brache, who highlighted the welcome given by local authorities and the population.

According to the head of the Cuban medical brigade, his compatriots treated 3,755 patients, and performed 60 surgeries and 6,500 nursing procedures, while collaborating on other tasks. (Source: Prensa Latina).

<https://www.radiohc.cu/en/noticias/nacionales/316379-solidarity-after-earthquakes-brings-cuba-and-turkiye-closer>

Radio Habana Cuba