Cuba Censorships Talent Theft in Baseball

This Monday's edition of Cuba's Granma newspaper strongly criticized the exodus of players and ex-players to the US Major Leagues, as another way of stealing its sports talents.

With the headline "Hired or adjusted to the laws of the United States?" the newspaper questions the trend that is dealt with in the American press as an escape in searching of an "atmosphere of freedom."

Why are none of the 30 teams in the Majors have been interested in any Cuban baseball players from the latest Cuban recruitment policy approval of these for any baseball category? Why US executives have not approached to the Cuban Baseball Federation for this purpose instead of putting them in the hands of the international crime of human trafficking?, asks Granma.

In this regard, the article blames US policies, particularly the economic, commercial and financial blockade against Cuba, with 50 years of existence and over 20 being condemned by the international community, which does not allow US clubs to hire Cuban players.

In that sense, the newspaper article argues that the Cuban Adjustment Act is the instrument being used to give a semblance of legality to the theft of talent, but it fits only for players who leave their country.

Next, the publication asks why there can not be a normal relationship between MLB teams and Cuban players when it exists with over 240 athletes from 16 nations taking part in the baseball elite tournament in the United States.

You are only eligible if you give up Cuba, according to the Cuban daily, ensuring that between leases and misrepresentations, Cuban sports and players are involved in a turbulent atmosphere.

According to the newspaper, all this "has the miserable target of turning heroes into traitors and for that millions of dollars are allocated. Any resemblance to unconventional warfare is no mere coincidence."

After listing the achievements of some Cuban players in the latest campaign in the so-called Big Top, Granma stated that this only comes to confirm the quality of Cuban baseball and lessons learned in their training.

On this point, the paper reminds readers that once these players have chosen this illegal migration, they lose the right to represent their country in major international events.

It is not Cuba that denies them this right, but the very laws to which they "have been adjusted" which veto them to wear the uniform of the four letters, as they are no longer free to enjoy that sovereign right, notes the daily.

Finally, the paper touches on the recent arrival in the United States of Antonio Pacheco, one of the best Cuban players in history, who aspires to coach or manage a major league team.

Pacheco is and will be remembered for all he did for the fans; however, he is already another victim, the note says.

Granma also recognizes that according to the preparation he acquired in the process of training in Cuba, he will not lack offers, but questioned whether he could be happy to give up his beloved country.

The United States has not rested a minute in its dirty war against Cuba. To do this, for over 50 years it has used both the club and the carrot, understood as subversion... and baseball is another of those edges.
