

U.S. Veteran and Journalist Says U.S. Troops Serve as Mercenaries

Copenhagen, February 28 (RHC)-- Many U.S. troops who participate in armed conflicts around the world do so as “mercenaries” against innocent nations, a U.S. veteran and journalist in Denmark says. “People who are fighting other people who have done them no harm and are doing it for pay, are mercenaries. They’re not real soldiers defending their own country,” said Ron Ridenour.

“They’re attacking totally innocent people and innocent countries and of course doing so against all the rules of the United Nations and creating more and more enemies,” Ridenour said during a phone interview with Press TV on Friday. “If you’re a decent human being anywhere in the world, you’re not going to want to destroy other people in order to please some rich politicians who are doing so for oil,” he added.

Ridenour said many former soldiers have an extremely guilty conscience and commit suicide for “murdering people that had done nothing to them.” The suicide crisis in the U.S. military is an ongoing phenomenon since the Pentagon started to deploy troops to Iraq and Afghanistan more than a decade ago as part of the so-called war on terror.

Recent figures by the U.S. Defense Department show suicides among active-duty military personnel rose slightly in 2014, remaining at historically high numbers for a fifth year. Increases in suicides among American sailors and airmen last year raised total suicides among active-duty personnel to 288, up from 286 in 2013, according to preliminary Pentagon statistics.
