

Urban Agriculture Contributes Half of Cuba's Vegetable Production

Havana, April 17 (RHC) – Urban and family gardening contributes 50 percent of the country’s vegetable production with over one million Cubans involved in this developing initiative.

During the closing session of the Second International Congress on Urban and Family Gardening, held in Havana, Cuban Agriculture minister Gustavo Rodriguez said that the initiative has helped create more than 300 thousand jobs.

Given difficulties in traditional agriculture models, the country is developing ecological agriculture, which is consolidating as a movement that includes local producers linked to the advancement of science and technology.

Organic or ecological agriculture is playing a main role amidst food production efforts, given the initiative of making idle lands productive, creating new jobs and developing a healthy food culture.

The international urban and family agriculture forum was attended by representatives of 25 countries and 37 Cuban entities. Participants discussed nearly 200 papers which were considered a significant contribution to advance urban and family agriculture in Cuba and in other parts of the world.
