

WikiLeaks Says Trump Lied on Taxes, Working to Release Returns

Washington, January 24 (RHC)-- Anti-secrecy website WikiLeaks has accused U.S. President Donald Trump of breaching a promise to release his tax returns, calling on people with access to the documents to come forward and help disclose them.

"Trump's breach of promise over the release of his tax returns is even more gratuitous than [former secretary of state Hillary] Clinton concealing her Goldman Sachs transcripts," WikiLeaks wrote in a tweet on. The statement came after Trump's counselor Kellyanne Conway said the president was not going to release his tax records after all. Conway told ABC earlier that "people did not care" about Trump's tax record.

"They voted for him, and let me make this very clear: most Americans are very focused on what their tax returns will look like while President Trump is in office, not what his look like," she argued. WikiLeaks took issue with that statement and said it would release the records if someone submits them.

An on-line petition demanding the immediate release of "Trump's full tax returns, with all information needed to verify emoluments clause compliance" has 250,323 signatures as of Monday, more than twice the number it needs to be considered by the administration.

Ever since announcing his intention to run for the top job, Trump has resisted pressure to release his tax returns. When he was pressed on the issue by Clinton during the presidential debates, the Manhattan billionaire promised to release the records once ongoing audits were completed.

Headed by Julian Assange, the WikiLeaks organization published thousands of hacked e-mails and documents belonging to the Democratic Party and its various organizations before the vote, exposing an insider attempt against Vermont Senator Bernie Sanders, Clinton's fierce primary opponent.

Among the documents were transcripts from highly-paid private speeches before executives of top corporate banking institutions like Goldman Sachs, where the former first lady admitted that she was "far removed" from the issues of middle class Americans due to the "fortunes" she and her husband and ex-president Bill Clinton "enjoy" while pledging to do "all she could" for the Wall Street to prosper.

<https://www.radiohc.cu/index.php/en/noticias/internacionales/119367-wikileaks-says-trump-lied-on-taxes-working-to-release-returns>

Radio Habana Cuba