

Parents and children were being detained separately. But after public outcry, Trump last week ordered that they be brought back together. Now, the administration says it will continue with prosecutions and seek to detain families together during their immigration proceedings.

About 9,000 such family units have been caught in each of the last three months, according to U.S. border authorities. The U.S. government said Saturday it still had 2,053 children in its custody who were separated from their parents.

The Department of Homeland Security claims it has what it calls "a well coordinated" process in place in the face of criticism from lawyers for parents and children who have said they have seen little evidence of an organized system.
