

U.S. Food and Drug Administration fails to protect young people from vaping risks

New York, February 4 (RHC)-- In health news, the American Lung Association says in a new report the government is failing to protect minors from the dangers of e-cigarettes and tobacco. The group gave an "F" grade to the Food and Drug Administration for failing to act as the rate of e-cigarette use among high school students shot up by nearly 80 percent over the past two years.

The report warns that e-cigarettes contain levels of nicotine that could cause addiction and affect brain development in young people. Meanwhile, a study published in a medical journal found that vaping is almost two times as effective as nicotine gum or patches for quitting smoking.

<https://www.radiohc.cu/index.php/en/noticias/internacionales/182665-us-food-and-drug-administration-fails-to-protect-young-people-from-vaping-risks>

Radio Habana Cuba