

34,000 Haitians still displaced 10 years after earthquake

Port-au-Prince, January 11 (RHC)-- There are at least 34,000 people living in displacement camps 10 years after a devastating earthquake struck Haiti. According to the head of the UN mission in Haiti, when the quake hit on January 12, 2010, there were 1.5 million displaced people in over 1,500 camps and displacement sites.

"Now, we have about 22 displaced sites that remain open and 34,000 people still living in the situation of displacement, although we have to say that, after 10 years, for many of them this has become the normal situation." According to the UN official, they are not either willing or do not have the possibility to move out of the displacement site, while some are even doing construction, trying to settle in these areas.

In the camps, he reported that there was no electricity for most of the day, access to water is difficult, there are areas that you can see just walking around that are very overcrowded, overpopulated.

Since the crisis has left 3.7 million people with food insecurity, there has been a boost in immigration, and a lot of people – at least one member of the family, mostly men between 18-35 years old – are looking for job opportunities, especially in Brazil but also in the Bahamas.

It is estimated that around 1.5-2 million Haitians are living abroad, corresponding to one-fifth of the population - mostly in Canada, the United States, Brazil and Chile.

<https://www.radiohc.cu/index.php/en/noticias/internacionales/211663-34000-haitians-still-displaced-10-years-after-earthquake>

Radio Habana Cuba