

Trump administration rolls back regulations on toxic mercury emissions

Washington, April 22 (RHC)-- In environmental news, the Donald Trump administration has rolled back regulations on emissions of toxic mercury and other pollutants from coal- and oil-fired power plants. The new rule changes how the Environmental Protection Agency will run cost-benefit analyses for power plants.

The perceived health benefits of cutting pollution will be reduced, while the economic costs of curbing pollution will be increased.

Mercury is a highly toxic metal that causes brain damage and birth defects.
