

U.S. food program fails to reach millions as child hunger surges

Washington, May 29 (RHC)-- In the midst of the COVID-19 pandemic, the rates of child hunger are soaring across the United States. Despite the surge, a federal program to feed schoolchildren who've been cut off from school meals during the pandemic has reached only a small fraction of the 30 million students it was intended to help.

The New York Times reports only 15% of eligible children have received benefits under the Pandemic EBT program, even though a fifth of U.S. mothers in a recent survey reported their children were not getting enough to eat.

Meanwhile, the Census Bureau reports more than a third of all U.S. adults are showing signs of clinical anxiety or depression during the pandemic. That figure is about double the rate found in a survey in 2014.

<https://www.radiohc.cu/index.php/en/noticias/internacionales/224085-us-food-program-fails-to-reach-millions-as-child-hunger-surges>

Radio Habana Cuba