

St. Louis couple who brandished guns at BLM protesters indicted by grand jury

Image not found or type unknown

Mark and Patricia McCloskey waved guns at protesters in front of their St. Louis home on June 28. (Photo: UPI)

St. Louis, October 7 (RHC)-- Mark and Patricia McCloskey, the St. Louis couple who brandished guns at Black Lives Matter protesters, threatening to kill them, have been indicted by a grand jury.

Jurors agreed to indict the McCloskeys for unlawful use of a weapon and evidence tampering, the St. Louis Post-Dispatch reported, citing the couple's lawyer. The felony indictments essentially mean that jurors found probable cause that the McCloskeys were guilty of the weapons violations, as charged by St. Louis Circuit Court Attorney Kimberly Gardner in July, and expanded the case to also include evidence tampering.

With the indictments secured, Gardner won't need to go through a preliminary hearing to convince a judge that there is enough probability of guilt for the case to proceed to trial. The evidence-tampering charge apparently concerns the pistol that Patricia McCloskey waved at protesters.

Patricia McCloskey claimed that the pistol was inoperable when she surrendered it to police after the incident. However, it was reported that Gardner's staff ordered the police crime lab to take apart and reassemble the gun to make the otherwise out-of-service weapon capable of "lethal use."

McCloskey's attorney, Joel Schwartz, at the time accused the prosecutors' office of tampering with the evidence to charge the couple. "It's disheartening to learn that a law enforcement agency altered evidence in order to prosecute an innocent member of the community," Schwartz said back in July.

The charges stem from a June 28 incident that has sparked a firestorm of controversy over the rights of citizens to defend themselves in the age of Black Lives Matter protests. The McCloskeys said demonstrators broke through their neighborhood's iron gates, trespassing on their property. The protesters said they came through an unlocked gate and marched past without going onto the McCloskeys' property.

Mark McCloskey told reporters that while none of the demonstrators was charged with trespassing, he and his wife -- both lawyers in their early 60s -- face felony charges that "could cost us four years of our life and our law licenses." He said they are being persecuted "because we had the gall to protect our home and our family against the mob."

Missouri Governor Mike Parson, a Republican, said at the time Gardner's charges were announced in July that he would pardon the McCloskeys if they were convicted. President Donald Trump and Senator Josh Hawley, a Missouri Republican, also have defended the couple, with Hawley asking the Department of Justice to open a civil-rights investigation. The McCloskeys even spoke at the Republican National Convention (RNC) in August.

Democrats, such as television writer Knell Scovell, cheered the grand jury indictments. "Indicted – and that's why they fit in perfectly at the RNC," Scovell tweeted. Author and Young Turks host Adrienne Lawrence tweeted sarcastically about the McCloskeys potentially losing their law licenses: "That'd be a shame."

<https://www.radiohc.cu/index.php/en/noticias/internacionales/236072-st-louis-couple-who-brandished-guns-at-blm-protesters-indicted-by-grand-jury>

Radio Habana Cuba