White man with assault rifle kills 10 in Colorado supermarket

Denver, March 23 (RHC)-- In the U.S. city of Boulder, Colorado, a gunman opened fire without warning in a supermarket Monday afternoon, killing 10 people. Witnesses described a horrific scene of bodies littering supermarket aisles as the shooter systematically fired round after round at shoppers without saying a word.

Police injured a white male suspect outside the King Soopers grocery store and took him into custody. He has not been identified, and no motive in the killings is known. Among those shot dead was 51-year-old police officer Eric Talley, who was the first on the scene.

Resident Steven McHugh dropped his family members off at the supermarket's pharmacy, where his son-in-law was in line for a COVID-19 vaccine with his two grandchildren. McHugh said the family witnessed people being shot around them and hid in a closet until police rescued them.

Steven McHugh told reporters: "It's not OK that we don't have better gun control laws. Let me just say that. It's not, you know, when it's your family. ... This has got to stop. Every week, every week in the United States, is a shooting. Now it's our turn. And that should never be repeated anywhere."
