

Spanish man arrested for purposefully infecting 22 people with COVID-19

Image not found or type unknown

Madrid, April 26 (RHC)-- Spanish police have detained a man who allegedly showed up to work and hit the gym while displaying coronavirus symptoms instead of going into quarantine. Police say he infected a total of 22 people, many by proxy.

Madrid, April 26 (RHC)-- Spanish police have detained a man who allegedly showed up to work and hit the gym while displaying coronavirus symptoms instead of going into quarantine. Police say he infected a total of 22 people, many by proxy.

The National Police launched an investigation at the end of January after learning that an outbreak in a 'well-known establishment' in Manacor, a town on the island of Mallorca, may have been the result of an individual who tried to hide that he was infected.

According to authorities, the 40-year-old suspect was urged to go home by colleagues after showing symptoms of the disease. Once his work day finished, the man visited a medical center to receive a PCR test. However, instead of waiting for the results, the next day he went to the gym and showed up for work, even though he had a fever of over 40°C (104°F).

He was reportedly told by his boss to leave, an order which he refused. Instead, he walked around the premises, coughing while lowering his mask and telling co-workers: "I am going to give you all the coronavirus."

After finishing work, he was informed that his PCR test had returned positive. His colleagues were then tested to see if they had the disease. Five tested positive, who in turn passed the virus on to relatives, including three babies. At the gym that the suspect frequented, three people tested positive, and they also transmitted the illness to family members. In total, it's believed that the man infected 22 people with COVID-19, eight of them directly and 14 indirectly. None of the cases required hospitalization.

The man was arrested on Saturday and is currently in custody. Authorities said that in Spain, as in many other countries, breaking quarantine or intentionally passing the virus on to others can result in hefty fines and prison sentences.

<https://www.radiohc.cu/index.php/en/noticias/internacionales/255333-spanish-man-arrested-for-purposefully-infecting-22-people-with-covid-19>

Radio Habana Cuba