

Quebec to allow some COVID-positive essential workers to continue working

Image not found or type unknown

Ottawa, December 30 (RHC)-- The Canadian province of Quebec will allow some essential workers to continue working even after testing positive for COVID-19, in what Health Minister Christian Dubé said was an effort to prevent staff shortages from impeding healthcare services.

“Omicron’s contagion is so exponential that a huge number of personnel have to be withdrawn — and that poses a risk to the network capacity to treat Quebecers,” Dube told reporters at a briefing in Ottawa. “We made the decision that under a certain condition, positive staff will be able to continue working according to a list of priority and risk management.”

Quebec, which has been setting daily records since the Omicron variant started a new wave of rapidly rising infections, recorded 12,833 new cases on Monday — the highest one-day count of any region in Canada during the pandemic.

<https://www.radiohc.cu/index.php/en/noticias/internacionales/281336-quebec-to-allow-some-covid-positive-essential-workers-to-continue-working>

Radio Habana Cuba