

Junior doctors in England launch fresh strike over pay dispute

---

Image not found or type unknown

London, December 22 (RHC)-- Junior doctors in England have staged a strike in the run-up to Christmas in an attempt to force the government to make a fresh effort to improve their pay and working conditions.

The two-phase nine-day strike, which started on Wednesday, was the longest industrial action by the junior doctors yet.

UK health bosses say the move will pile pressure on senior doctors and bring down the quality of medical services at the busiest time of year. The first phase of the junior doctors' strike ends on Saturday 0700 GMT and six more days of industrial action are planned from January 3.

The industrial action takes place at one of the busiest times of the year for state-funded hospitals run by the National Health Service (NHS), as it faces increased pressure from widespread seasonal respiratory illnesses during the winter holidays.

"Routine care is virtually at a standstill" during these strikes, the NHS medical director has said, as the system is bracing itself for one of the toughest strikes in its history.

Professor Sir Stephen Powis warned of the "huge disruption" expected across the NHS hospitals as consultants move to provide cover. Powis said that the junior doctors' nine-day strike would "put the NHS on the back foot" as it enters its most pressurized time of year.

Hospital bosses claim strikes by junior doctors have strained their relationship with consultants, leading to tensions with more senior colleagues who are tired of having to cover for junior doctors as well as doing their own monthly shifts.

Consultants are frustrated because junior doctors in England are striking at a time when hospitals are under the heaviest workload of the year because of the surge in winter illnesses, staff holidays, and lack of social care support.

Meanwhile, the junior doctors' strike also met with criticism from the UK government which oversees public health policy in England. UK Prime Minister Rishi Sunak said the lengthy strike during this critical time was his "worst fears realized."

The prime minister said: "We would encourage junior doctors to consider carefully the extremely significant impact striking at such a challenging time will have both on the NHS and for individual patients and to return to talks."

Earlier this month, the British Medical Association (BMA) announced the junior doctors' plan to take strike action after the failure of talks with the government. The talks failed after junior doctors were only offered a 3 percent rise on top of the average 8.8 percent increase they were given earlier this year. The junior doctors' union said it rejected the offer because the cash would be split unevenly across different doctor grades and would "still amount to pay cuts for many doctors".

The UK government has delegated health policy in Scotland, Wales, and Northern Ireland to their local administrations.

Hospital doctors in Wales are due to walk out for 72 hours from January 15. The junior doctors in Northern Ireland are being balloted for potential strike action. However, their Scottish counterparts have struck a deal with the government in Edinburgh.

Hospitals typically see a rise in the number of people in hospital in the two weeks after Christmas due to people delaying seeking treatment in order to spend the festive season with loved ones.

The NHS is already facing huge backlogs in waiting times for appointments and surgery, blamed on treatment postponement during COVID and also years of underfunding.

---

<https://www.radiohc.cu/index.php/en/noticias/internacionales/342818-junior-doctors-in-england-launch-fresh-strike-over-pay-dispute>

Radio Habana Cuba