

Cuban Health Workers Arrive in Sierra Leone to Fight Ebola

Freetown, October 3 (RHC)— A Cuban brigade of 165 health specialists arrived Thursday in Freetown, Sierra Leone, to join the fight on Ebola, according to the webpage of the Cuban embassy in Ghana. The brigade was welcomed by Deputy Health Minister Madina Rahman, who said that the Cubans left their homes and families to come to her country in order to fight the terrible disease and share knowledge with local doctors.

Cuban ambassador to Ghana, Jorge Lefebre, who was also at the airport, described Ebola as another war and said that the Cuban professionals came with the commitment of saving the lives of their sisters and brothers of Sierra Leone.

With the assistance of China, Cuba and a medical team from the U.K. which is helping to set up laboratories and treatment centers in the country, local authorities hope to eliminate Ebola in Sierra Leone.

According to the World Health Organization, the Cubans have over 15 years of experience in controlling and fighting epidemics.
