Sailing

The arrival in Havana of 5 catamarans from Key West on Saturday, May 16th, opened a new page in the history of U.S.-Cuba sport navigation.

15 years had to pass from the 1st Havana Challenge —a race held in 2000 for the first time— for the U.S. government to grant the organizers permission to sail to Cuba legally again.

The trip has been made possible in the context of ongoing negotiations to re-establish relations between the United States and Cuba.

The fleet of American boats taking part in this first trip to Cuba comprises other 15 ships, including 2 replicas of 18th-century schooners.

In addition to crossing the Florida Straits, the American sailors will race Cuban boats from the National Sailing Team and other 2 teams from Matanzas province. The race will extend over 1 nautical mile along Havana's Malecon seafront, starting at the level of the Hotel Nacional in Vedado and finishing at the Deauville Hotel, in Centro Habana.

Commodore Jose Miguel Dias Escrich, head of Cuba's Hemingway International Nautical Club (CNIH), said at a local press conference that all the ships will take part in a boat parade on Wednesday along the northern coast. The schooners are expected to be the main attraction of the show.

“The joint organization of this event by the Key West Sailing Club, the Key West Sailing Center and the CNIH, means a great deal for both countries,” said Commodore Escrich.

“Many American sailing clubs have conveyed to us their interest in organizing their own races in 2015 and 2016. More and more clubs want to fraternize with us through this kind of event,” he added.

On the American side, one of the organizers, Joe Weatherby, a Key West charter boat captain for almost 30 years, told reporters that the Challenge could become an annual event now that the U.S. Treasury Department has granted them a license.
